A plan to engineer a coup attempt was hatched in the office of the National Intelligence Organisation, the government has admitted, and it was foiled only after the coup attempt was launched. The two officers who tried to assassinate President Recep Tayyip Erdogan have already been tried and jailed. And Erdogan's political enemies are already being convicted and jailed. But it's also easy to draw a line from those events to the election that saw the AK Party lose much of its support and secure just 41 percent of the vote. And that election seems to be repeating itself, as the neo-fascist Jobbik party, a splinter of the Hungarian Jobbik party that rose to power in one of the biggest-ever parliamentary elections in 2014, has just won 22 percent of the vote in the Finnish election. And in an election where the centre-right leader of the Finns party, Timo Soini, said in his campaign that he was "ashamed" of the new government's stance on immigration, the government has just put asylum seekers who have been admitted to Finland through the Balkan route on the blacklist. If the last four years have taught us anything, it's that it's not always possible to identify the difference between someone being a Putin puppet and someone being a fascist. But, having said that, the list of things that have happened in the last four years - from Turkey's invasion of the north of Syria to the UK government's inaction on the Syrian refugee crisis - has also shown us that while Europe may have common values, it's far from the idealistic notion that we should all be a part of a united Europe. The situation is therefore that Europe is facing, at least in its political sphere, a situation that's a bit like the one that we saw after 2010's UK election, with the Tories and the Lib Dems having to form a coalition in order to keep things stable. And if it hadn't been for the Labour party, who've bounced back from the near-death experience of the last four years to win 40 percent of the vote, it's hard to see how the situation might have been resolved. It may seem that there's a trend to the

Neural network can hear speech in ultrasound [video] - dnetesn ===== matthamb Surprised by the video stating that it was recorded in vivo (in a living animal). That seems like quite a feat. ~~~~ bm1362 Ditto, but the video states the study was done in rats. ----- maurycy IIRC, it's been already done by John Carmack a few years ago. hour left until the Disney board of directors gathers for a meeting to finalise his departure, two people close to the board have told the Guardian. Fils-Aimé's exit comes less than two months after he took over from Robert A Iger as chief executive of the much-criticised theme park giant. The decision is being seen as a further sign that Disney's financial health is returning to something more like pre-2008 levels, having suffered a $4.1bn accounting scandal in 2009 that led to a worldwide change in culture and value of the corporation. A Disney spokesperson declined
